2013 Fall Release Letter

"A great wine is crafted in the vineyards, not in the cellar." ~ Henri Mayer

2011 Sonoma Coast: The Season

The above statement couldn't hold more truth whether it be in Burgundy, where Mayer crafted his magnificent wines, or here in California, where we strive for our own. Mother Nature was in charge (as always!) in 2011, yet by intuiting her next move, we were prepared for everything she threw at us. It was the coldest vintage I have yet to experience and while cold vintages can be wrought with challenges, they can also be great. A cold season equates to needing more time to ripen but that doesn't hold truth if there is a small quantity of crop on the vine as was the case in 2011. It's best correlated by thinking of tomato plants. Fewer tomatoes equates to sooner to pick, with ripeness. More tomatoes equates to later to pick, with less ripe. The blessing in 2011 was a small crop of great quality.

An unusually wet and cool spring delayed the start of the 2011 growing season. Flowering and fruit set, a period that always has a profound influence on the construction of the vintage, was especially fraught in 2011 when a June storm hit and "shattered" a portion of our undeveloped crop.

"Shatter" occurs when rain interrupts the vine's reproductive cycle. Normally, grapevines self-pollinate, which results in the development of grape clusters. In 2011, when many vines had started to drop their pollen seeds down onto their eggs, rains interrupted this delicate cycle. The rain washed away some of the pollen, and in some cases prevented a little cap on the stamen from popping off, in effect shattering the cluster as seen in this picture.

The shatter increased the overall quality of the vintage but reduced the quantity. With a smaller crop, vines can focus their resources on ripening fewer berries, often leading to fruit with greater intensity. This was the first significant event of the vintage and, while it didn't determine the true final quality, it did have a strong influence on it.

Summertime temperatures remained atypically cool for the rest of the growing season, rarely rising above 90°F. This encouraged steady, slow development, which contributed to the greatness of the vintage. Finally, in mid-September, a welcome burst of temperatures began to reach the mid-90s for nearly a week. It was during this warm spike that we began picking vineyards as quickly as we could. This turned out to be a wise decision, as the hot weather didn't hold and the forecast called for significant rain in early October. Fortunately, on Oct. 3rd when the rain began, we had less than 6% of our fruit still hanging on the vines. A few days later, on Oct. 10th, another storm swept through and brought with it hot, humid conditions, which caused an outburst of botrytis (rot). We were fortunate to have avoided a dramatic end to a truly wonderful season.

Our vineyards were harvested in the following order:

September 21 Campbell Ranch, Sonoma (1st pick)

September 22 McDougall Ranch, Sonoma

September 23 Sonoma Stage, Sonoma

September 23 Savoy, Anderson (1st pick)

September 26 Campbell Ranch, (2nd pick)

September 26 Savoy, Anderson (2nd pick)

October 2 Le Jons, Sonoma

October 15 Falstaff, Sonoma

The Wines

The tasting notes below were written by Antonio Galloni, formerly of the Wine Advocate and now Vinous Media.

2011 McDougall Ranch, Sonoma Coast, Pinot Noir 95 Pts. 13.6% The highlight among these current and upcoming releases, Jamie Kutch's 2011 Pinot Noir McDougall Ranch is drop-dead gorgeous. Savory herbs, dried flowers, black cherries and licorice all jump from the glass in this deep, layered wine. The 75% whole clusters come through only in the bouquet, as the fruit is so intense, they are barely noticeable on the palate. The balance of fruit, acidity and tannin is exceptional. I can't wait to see how McDougall Ranch ages. It is clearly one of the most impressive wines of the vintage. 2014-2020

2011 Falstaff, Sonoma Coast, Pinot Noir 93 Pts. 12.7% Kutch's 2011 Pinot Noir Falstaff is striking. A rich, layered wine, the 2011 is endowed with serious depth. Black cherries, spices, flowers, leather and tobacco all take shape in this fleshy, radiant Pinot. The Falstaff is one of the bigger 2011s here. Amazingly, it comes in at just 12.7% alcohol. The 50% whole clusters are very nicely integrated. Kutch waited until after the rain to pick this fruit and was rewarded with fabulous wine. 2014-2020

Please allow all wines to rest for a few months after delivery to resolve the shock from shipping.

Thank you for your continued interest and support. Drink well!
